Not illustrated. 1884 Excerpt: ...him raised a mound: and round the tomb Grew elm-trees planted by the mountain-nymphs, The daughters they of aegis-bearing Zeus. And brothers seven, whom in my home I had, All in one day to Hades' dwelling went, For godlike fleet Achilles slew them all Among their slow-paced kine and white-wool'd sheep. Then, for my mother, who beneath the woods Of Placus dwelt a queen, when hither brought With other wealth of spoil, he set her free Back to return for ransom large received: And in my father's halls she met swift death Struck down by Artemis the arrow-queen. But, Hector, thou to me art all in one, Father and honoured mother, brother thou, And thou my manly husband. Wherefore yield, And pity feel, and here upon the tower Remain, lest fatherless thou make thy child, Widow thy wife. There by the fig-tree stay The host, where easiest is the town to scale, The wall to breach. For thrice upon that side The bravest foes assayed us, massed around Ajaces twain and famed Idomeneus, And round the Atridae and bold Tydeus' son; Or at the prompting of some cunning seer, Or spurred by wit and counsel of their own." And mighty plumed Hector made reply: "All this, dear wife, I heed as well as thou: But am sore shamed before the sons of Troy And long-robed daughters, if in coward wise I skulk apart from war. Nor doth my soul Prompt me thereto; for always to be brave I learnt, and in the Trojan van to fight, Saving my father's glory and my own. For there will come--my heart doth know full well--A day of doom to sacred Ilion, And Priam's self, and tough-speared Priam's host. Yet not so much the Trojans' woes to come Heed I, nor woes of Hecuba herself, Or sovereign Priam, or my brothers' fate, Who many and brave, prone in the dust shall fall By foemen's hands--not these...
