Life has a habit of kicking you in the teeth.

Ann is trapped in a situation she cannot escape, and in the first of many soliloquies, she complains bitterly about the confinement of her surroundings in a tiny flat, and yearns for freedom. She needs to go for a walk on the hills where her ailing husband Robert cannot come.

The stress of a failed business has caused Robert to end up dependent on her. Unable to deal with the shock, they are drifting apart.

After a brief affair, Ann escapes on a two week trip to the Holy Land, but the commercialism of Jerusalem and the alienation of the Jews leave her cold. Only when she comes to Galilee does she find a semblance of tranquility.

Back home, Robert begs her to stay, but she cannot bring herself to love him like she used to.

Looking up at the hills, Ann wonders if there is a chance of happiness after all?
